A lot of money is riding on how well citizens respond to the Special Census. The city is spending close to $70,000 to conduct the poll.

The 1990 Census reported 16,177 residents living in the city. City Manager Lomax Harrelle is betting that figure is 2,000 to 3,000 too low.

Five years of lower advalorem taxes has cut deeply into the city's budget, according to Mr. Harrelle, and the money could be used in many ways.

"We're really hoping for better numbers," said Mr.
Harrelle. "The additional money will mean a lot to the city."

Reggie Bigham, Supervisor Survey Statistician from the Atlanta office of the Census, said workers began going door-to-door on Tuesday.

Taking the smell out of wastewater engineers have found a simple, low-cost solution to the often smelly problem of public and industrial wastewater treatment.

UF environmental engineering Professor Eric Allen has been researching a treatment method e says "is almost too good to be true."

It's called biofiltration and it uses microorganisms that live in beds of common trash and wood chips to literally eat the organic waste that wood carps to fuerally can be the produces the foul-smelling hydrogen sulfide gas.

"We can remove 99.9 percent of hydrogen sulfide gas by right-sizing these beds according to the concentrations of pollutants in the water,"

Allen said. "The toughest part is convincing the public and private companies that it works."

By filtering the contaminated water through these microorganism-filled beds, nourished by a healthy dose of air, all organic and many inorganic compounds can be eliminated at onehundredth the cost of prevailing methods, Allen

Two current methods of treatment -- charcoal filtration and chemical treatment -- fall short, Allen said, because the contaminated charcoal cannot be completely destroyed and chemicals are costly and sometimes only add to the ontamination problem.

But the biofiltration method disposes of the Gainesville--University of Florida environmental used microorganisms through the natural decay process.

"With the biofiltration system, we don't have to spend any money to fuel the microorganism-eating beasts," Allen said. "They just do it themselves." The City of Jacksonville's Public Works Department and the Kanapaha Treatment

Department and the Kanapaha Treatment Facility in Gainesville are among the first public facilities to use this system.

Most of Allen's funding comes from existing university funds. But Monsanto Corporation recently granted Allen and his team $20,000 to continue their research.

"There's a tremendous need ; for environmentally efficient systems today," said Allen. "Ever since the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency came out with a list of the 189 most toxic corporations in 1991, the pressure is on for these companies to clean up their acts."

The microorganisms Allen works with are just a few of those identified by scientists to help a rew of those identified by scientists to help clean up the environment. Allen hopes to identify other microorganisms which might prove to be keys to future breakthroughs. "The idea is to identify other microorganisms that interact with contaminants," Allen said.

"The ones we've identified are just the tip of the iceberg."
